As a college student, I have endured the long drives between DC and Cincinnati with a simple selection of just 2 FM and AM stations, both Evangelical stations. I use XM radio everyday and on every trip, and am disappointed that the federal government would try to strong-arm satellite radio. The local information I receive is, hands down, much faster, clearer, and more concise than any local FM station could ever have. I still use FM stations, when even the satellite radio has nothing good on, but since I do pay a fee each month for the clarity, lack of commercials, and information, I would expect that the local fm stations would pick up that their methods are not working, and try to fix their failing businesses, instead of making the 1.7 million paying XM radio subscribers suffer.
